

Pickup Car

Here's a classic. This widely circulated photo shows a VW Jetta sitting in a parking lot with the passenger inside sleeping. Somewhere back down the road, the driver had 3,000 pounds of lumber and concrete bags piled onto his car. This guy was obviously a few bricks short of a chimney, so what did the hardware store do? They made him sign a waiver before they loaded it all up.

Now I'm not trying to shift the blame, but did someone say "waiver"? Waiver! So they're saying it was OK that the guy might have killed himself or someone else with a ton and a half of wood because he signed a waiver? I'd like to know why the hardware store didn't just say "No way, pal! It's too dangerous. We're not loading one splinter of wood on your car."

Look folks, just 'cause someone is stupid enough to dream up an idea like this doesn't mean you have to go along with them. Draw the line at safety and just say "no".
